SOHO GETS ALL DOLLED UP

Space.NK, the hugely successful British brand, is storming the East Coast. "We've had a reaction... everyone's like, 'Why did you come over?'" says founder Nicky Kinnaid, a London-born beauty guru who crisscrosses the globe for some of the most innovative, effective products. The store is a previously edited, immaculate apothecary for men and women and feature familiar favorites (Nars, Lancôme) alongside cutting-edge skin care (Ar457, Pro-Ferret) (SheerinO'kho, Huiles & Baumes), and signature collections ranging from body and spa to home accessories. "You never know where you're going to find the next great product," explains Kinnaid, who can't live without her By Terry Light-Expert Foundation Brush. "I'm always interested in what's latest and greatest." With its list of exclusives including Eve Lom (the cult cleanser flies off shelves) and Zelens (the eye cream's a best-seller), Space.NK is a beauty nut's Nirvana, with fans including Kirsten Dunst, Renée Zellweger, and Keira Knightley. This fall, with the SoHo flagship flourishing, new stores are opening on the Upper West Side, at the Mall at Short Hills, and in Scarsdale. And with more Stateside stores planned, Kinnaid's brand of beauty is on the march. Watch this Space.

LITERARY SCENTS

Making perfume is "a bridge to my history, but also a way to find my own universe," says Kilian Hennessy. A grandson of the founder of the LVMH Group, he grew up frisking around the Cognac barrels in the family cellars, on France's Charente River. Kilian's interest in perfume peaked while he was attending the Sorbonne. He wrote his thesis on the semantics of smells, and, in turn, he studied with some of the great "noses" in the modern world.

After helping to market the fragrances of Dior, Paco Rabanne, Alexander McQueen, and Giorgio Armani, he was ready to create his own blend—L'Oeuvre Noire, or "Black Masterpiece," a collection of 10 scents (men's, women's, and unisex)—which now sells at Bergdorf Goodman, in New York City. The name refers to a Marguerite Yourcenar novel about a medieval alchemist as well as the stark black flagons that contain the "juice," as perfumers call their product.

The combined shields of Hector and Achilles that adorn the bottle give a nod to Homer's Iliad. And in a wink to Kilian's patrimony, there is a $2,500 refillable, Cognac-barrel-shaped fountain, available for all of his fragrances. "It's not so different, after all. Cognac you smell before you taste. The way they speak about Cognac is almost the same as the way we speak about perfume."

Bergdorf Blondes aren't the only ones with access to John Barrett anymore. This season, the famed New York City hairstylist, whose eponymous salon occupies the penthouse floor of the Fifth Avenue department store, debuts a new hair-care line, Elementage, which protects your locks from day-to-day weathering and natural aging. The sweetly scented, vitamin-enriched products, ranging from shampoo to styling balm, are definitely cutting-edge.
